"If you could get ninety-nine people to love you, you will always encounter the hundredth that doesn't."

-Psychologists Albert Ellis & Robert Harper

If you were to dedicate every free moment of your life trying to make everyone else happy, there would still be those who would be unappreciative and despise you for it.

If you could snap your fingers and instantly become the most popular person in school, you might find it to be rather shallow and not nearly what it's cracked up to be, or that people would still bad mouth you behind your back. In fact, you would find that others will dislike you precisely because you are popular.

If you could wave a magic wand and become the most attractive object of sexual desire in the world, it still might not bring the type of love and affection we all strive for.

If you could be perfect and manage to do everything right, guess what: there would still be legions of people out there who would hate you because you're perfect and do everything right.

At the end of the day, no matter what you do, you could never please everyone. So if you'll never get everyone else to like you anyway, you might as well stick to your principles. Be yourself. Be kind to others in all situations, and to all types of people. Do what you know in your heart to be right, and things will work out in the end. You won't get 100% of the people to like you 100% of the time, or even a small fraction of that. But you'll eventually obtain more true friends this way, and much more respect, than you would by living life trying to please others and conform to their standards.
