"Everyone has in him something of the criminal, the genius, and the saint."
-Psychologist Carl Jung

My oh my, do people love their labels. We love to point our fingers and say this person is good, this person is bad, this person is this and that person is such and such. If only life were that simple.

Nobody is all good, nor is anyone all evil. Nobody does all the right things all of the time, just like no one does all the wrong things all of the time. Nobody can be good at everything, yet everyone has their own special set of skills and gifts to offer the world.

If you can remember this principle in all your interactions, it will help you be a more kind, compassionate, and understanding person...leaps and bounds ahead of many adults in this area. We should always keep this idea in mind, and gently correct other people when their darker side emerges. We should encourage and foster each other's genius, while constantly searching for the saint that exists in everyone, praising and rewarding it when it reveals itself.

Life isn't so simple as to be divided into good and evil. Rather, good and evil exist alongside each other in all of us, and it is the way we treat each other which will ultimately decide which side will win over.
